Despite minutes of the last Fed meeting reflecting divided Federal Reserve officials, it remains on track to raise rates by December with a high odd of 76.7%, based on Bloomberg's survey. Market could start digesting change in Fed leadership soon. Additionally, we expect increased uncertainty in the oil markets, following US President Trump's anticipated decertification of the Iranian nuclear deal which would re-impose sanctions on Iran and possibly disrupt business dealings with the said country. On the local front, Congress' month-long recess has started last October 13 and will resume on November 13. While this has effectively delayed the Senate's passing of the Comprehensive Tax Reform Program (CTRP)'s first package, this should not be a problem as the market has yet to price in the effects of the CTRP.
